News media persist in discussing the achievement of peace as though it were the responsibility of a small subgroup in society—leaders of states, of nations, of insurgent groups or factions. So-and-so meets in a secluded location with what's-his-name, and they sign a paper. Peace ensues. As for the bulk of the affected populations, they may mill about in the streets, they may wave placards		2008

affected populations, they may mill about in the streets, they may wave placards or raise their fists in the air, but this is all backdrop for the real action.

Peace Through Health: How Health Professionals Can Work for a Less Violent ...

In developing theory on Peace through Health, it seemed important to understand the ways in which health sector actors sought to influence peace in their arena of action. The McMaster group attempted a finer-grained examination of the fundamental mechanisms by which changes might be induced. By examining accumulated case studies, we developed the following typology (MacQueen et al. 1997)
